The different occupational profiles of hereditary colorectal cancer: should they be a cause for anxiety? The different occupational profiles of hereditary non-polyposis colorectal cancer (HNPCC) patients were investigated by three validated questionnaires. Pain is reported to occur more frequently by the HNPCC group. The health-related quality of life (SF-36) scales showed a significant difference between the various patients. Work-related decision-making abilities were examined with the Stanford Health Assessment Questionnaire (HAQ). The poorer decision-making abilities in occupational activities ($p=0.025$) and household activities ($p=0.032$) were found in the HNPCC patients than in the control group. It was possible to determine distinct differences in occupational and social adaptation between the H
