Traditionally, the attributes of the player come from memory and are limited to the player that created them within the fictional world. The player's skin color, hair color, eye color, sex, height, mass, and position of play can all be altered in FIFA and other sports video games. From the 1970s to the 2000s, designers had limited options for player customization. If such a large variety of player attributes were used in a non-FIFA game, it would not feel as immersive and meaningful. For this reason, the team gave gamers limited options to change their characteristics. HyperMotion Technology enhances the experience. Dynamic player attributes can be accessed by the player in FIFA 22. By selecting a large number of attributes in the player customization menu, a unique avatar can be created. This avatar can then be used in any situation. Changes include a four times the accuracy in the passing and dribbling, speed and defensive acumen of the goalkeeper, height, weight, sprint speed, change of direction speed, height. Even in an economic game, FIFA is a realistic simulation; the added realism in FIFA 22 will give the player full control over the super players. HyperMotion Technology also allows them to take part in real-time strategy and tactical planning, where they can decide what to do and when to do it. And, the simulation engine works well with recording technology and the different game states of real-life football matches. The entire game engine in FIFA is linked with the EA Sports DNA. This not only allows for one of the finest-quality sports games in the industry, but it also means that players will never have to spend time on match-making in FIFA. The game engine also includes the "Collective Intelligence System" (C.I.S), which gathers data from artificial intelligence players and then gives players the same experience. The EA Sports team had the difficult task of creating an AI engine in FIFA that would respect what was happening on the football field. What players do on the field is a highly complex and calculated play. In reality, the game should be able to gather information as to when the team is attacked and then put players into the correct positions. In order to do this, the AI team studied the game to come up with their own novel algorithm that had to be coded for FIFA 20. The effect was
