The present invention is directed to a device for attaching an interventional tool to an elongate support such as a catheter and more particularly to a male connecting member designed to attach an interventional tool to a male luer of a catheter. Interventional tools such as guidewires, angioplasty catheters, etc. are commonly used in a wide variety of medical procedures. These tools are often inserted through a long flexible elongate support such as a catheter. Accordingly, there is a need to securely yet releasably attach an interventional tool to the elongate support. The connections must be secure yet releasable to permit the interventional tool to be separated from the elongate support for use and easy to connect thereto for implantation. Prior art interventional tools such as guide catheters are known to use various luer connectors. However, prior art luer connectors have limited precision and are difficult to manipulate. For example, in order to make a secure connection, some prior art luer connectors have used a radially compressible, fusible collar to fix the male luer into the female luer. There are problems associated with the use of such a fusible collar. For example, the fusible collar may melt prior to implantation into a patient, thereby preventing use of the device. Also, the fusible collar may be exposed to a fluid or bodily substance, possibly contaminating the device. Another prior art device includes a portion which is compressed radially. The portion of the connector is made of plastic and, due to the nature of the plastic and the ability of the plastic to plasticize under heat, the plastic is not fusible. Accordingly, this connector may require sterilization processes to be performed, thereby increasing the cost of the device c9d1549cdd

I have played this game for about 3 days, and I am very pleased with it. The character, Wally, is an interesting young man who seems to have a really full life at times, then gets killed off for no apparent reason, causing a cascading effect which I feel strongly affects the story. Overall, I feel that this is a game which is going to be published by a bigger company (Xenon Vision?) and will be released at a later date (this was found out about a week after the initial release). I think that the developer should have taken his time, released the game at a later date, and finished the game properly. I did not understand much of the story at times. I was told that there are no words in this language (Italian?). I don't mind, however, since I am a world traveler and I like to think in pictures and not in words. I enjoyed it though, and I would play the game again. I give the game 3.5 stars out of 5. Good game, though I have a few issues with it. 1.) The first 3 hours of gameplay (time in between your first and second encounters with magic), is spent in an inventory based game. You are given 40 items to buy from various people, in order to get to your next destination. I think it would be more effective to have a map of sorts, which I assume can be opened at the touch of a button. Then you could find the next area (instead of trying to gather everything in one area), and then the next and so on. I have encountered my share of strange games, where I have been in the market, but it has been several hours since I have bought anything (usually, there isn't anything in the market for more than 30 minutes). 2.) The game's sound effects are just a little too loud. I have been listening to my music as I play, and when the sound effects occur (usually during fights), it is almost as if they are broadcast in my ear. I have tried to turn it down, but it doesn't make a difference. 3.) The item descriptions are a little wonky. For example, during the first 10 hours of gameplay, I bought 12 items and heard 4 different descriptions for each of them. While playing the second 10 hours of the game, I bought 20 more items and only heard 1 description for them. However, since each of the descriptions I heard were only 4 words long (for items, 4 words

What's new:

Here Down in the Earth At 5 p.m. on a Tuesday in April, John Goodman struts down the hallway of the Rancho Cucamonga Police Department. His red hair is a bushy mess, and he's sporting a gray Cleveland Indians baseball cap. Goodman, 51, has a full head of white hair, a big smile and a big, playful laugh. He is dressed in a black polo shirt, black slacks and a white windbreaker. In Goodman's left hand is a "court rider" with a handwritten note taped to it. The rider was prepared after learning police had declined to bring him in for questioning, and stipulates Goodman be allowed to drive home. "Once I receive the rider, I have five minutes to leave and if you don't follow, I will go to jaywalking," Goodman says. "You're on your own." Down a short hallway in the police station, Goodman checks behind a partition, down another hallway and then leads the way back. It's about 15 feet and he's laughing. A group of cops wearing Hawaiian shirts hold back as Goodman stuffs the court rider under a chair. "He's a little bit crazy," says Officer Robert Evans. Goodman and his attorney, Summer Lujan, smile as they step out of the station's lobby. Lujan tells Goodman she once has to have a "counseling episode" while babysitting her own daughter at the age of 12 — but that is nothing compared to the coddling he's receiving from his lawyer now. The two quietly make their way to Goodman's truck in the parking lot. There is a letter from the sheriff's department, which states the department has a warrant out for Goodman's arrest in connection with the May 29 shooting of his stepdaughter's ex-boyfriend. Goodman says he doesn't have time to go home and change, but he still looks good. The two will take a drive and enjoy the openness and noise of the road. They cruise down Santa Anita Avenue and then head north along El Cajon Boulevard. John Goodman pulled the trigger. He didn't shoot the boyfriend 20 times just because he wouldn't stop sitting in his pickup
