Real-life player data driven gameplay: Real-life player characteristics, such as stamina, mobility, acceleration, and distance covered, are used in FIFA 22 to create unique reactions and behaviours that are unique to that player. One example is the ball control AI - the player's skills are combined with one or two pre-defined types of control. A player will move towards and away from the ball based on their skills, and will possess a wide variety of qualities that describe their ability to play the ball. Another is 'precise dribbling', which is an interactive AI that can utilise player and ball skills to perform manoeuvres, stunts and feints. Players are also able to receive a 'combination of passes' from other players, with the pass type and frequency dependant on the player's skills. A more technical example is 'perfect touches' - a skill that players will use to turn the ball over opponents, creating turnovers. These defensive, offensive and interception tactics are tied to player and ball behaviour, rather than a standardised set of routines programmed into an AI. AI is now more skilful: AI controls are no longer static and rigid. Players are now able to react to situations faster and better, like when they hold the ball up in tight spaces. The game has been built around subtle hand gestures, and players are now able to read and use the ball better. An example of this is the "double-post" - a play made using the ball, where a player pushes a man past two or more defenders before sending him a pass back inside. There will be times when defenders are out of position and players can take advantage of that, or when the opposition will overload a defender and create an opening. The way a player plays a double-post is dependent on many factors, including the player's current position, the man he is playing with, and other teammates who may have 'swept' through to create space. Improvements to the AI in FIFA 22 include: New physics engine: The game uses its own physics engine which has seen significant improvements in game speed and player fatigue. Players now run faster than FIFA 17, and fatigue is addressed with an improved fatigue system that addresses the different rates at which players recover. Teamplay has been improved: FIFA 22 improves Teamplay, as well as the ball and

The anti-terror tax was the new legislation that the UK government introduced in the wake of the December 2014 terrorist attack at the Westminster Christmas market, in which a Tunisian man ploughed a van into pedestrians. The aim of this tax was to discourage people from using the cash economy to fund their terror and to bolster the existing tax regime. Specifically, it imposed more direct taxation on individuals doing business through companies. Shops and businesses already pay a payroll tax and a quarterly VAT return. But these two taxes were not enough to discourage terrorists from using cash to fund their activities. Another reason that the government introduced the direct tax was to prevent the top-rate income tax from falling. To take effect, the new tax fell into four bands. For people earning up to £100,000 a year, it was 3%. Above this amount, it was 5%. For people earning up to £150,000 a year, it was 6%. Above that amount, it was 10%. Practical implications The practical implications for these changes are somewhat speculative. Although we know that in the past, terrorists have used cash transactions, it is not clear whether they still do so. It is possible that they
