Click on "Update" to review them for changes. NOTE: These updates are not incremental changes, so if a change in the deployed configuration is required, you will be required to deploy a new configuration. A command similar to the one used in the first example above can be used in this case as well: %msbuild /f:DeployConfiguration.xml /p:Configuration=ReleaseConsole The changes to the configuration settings must be done in a different configuration than the production configuration, either due to the randomness of configuration id values or because they may need to be modified for changes to the application logic, so they can be applied individually. When deploying a release configuration, the change can be made to the production configuration if the latter is not an exact copy of the former. See the Deployment scripts for more information on deployment and changes to the configuration settings. These scripts are provided by Microsoft, but they can be customized as needed by you to be able to deploy your application to the needed environment using your organization's deployment process. The build machine can then be used to deploy the application in a different computer than the build machine or to validate the application for use. The deployment machine can also be used to deploy the application to specific end users or folders to be used by the application. The script deploys the application in the production environment. Its main goal is to deploy the application's configuration settings and patch it with the configuration settings changes made after the build script is run. The application is deployed to the production environment via a procedure similar to the one described above. This script provides the command line arguments to be used for the deployment. The script validates the deployed configuration for changes and provides the commands for the validation. These scripts can be customized in the same way as the deployment scripts for deployment configuration validation. After having the deployment scripts created, the deployment machine can be used to validate the deployed configuration to make sure there are no changes to the application's logic and then to deploy it to the targets that are needed to be used by the application. For more information about deployment, click here. Build Unit F. The Build Unit F is used to create a release assembly or application that contains the application's logic and the deployment configuration. Under the Build Unit element, you will find the following key elements:

- Assembly or project references
