replacement playersThis afternoon, the United States government announced an indictment of two Russian men for their purported roles in a hacking and spying campaign intended to influence the 2016 presidential election. The charges are somewhat unusual — they do not mention any campaign, nor do they name the election itself, but rather two people mentioned by name in the indictment who are alleged to have been involved in hacking Democrats. In the indictment, the Department of Justice describes an espionage effort that went on for more than two years and sought to exploit personal data of Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta. As The Verge's Matthew Keys has argued, the indictment is more than just an indictment of alleged espionage — it is the indictment of a campaign trail strategy, one where the Clinton team purposely left a trail of digital breadcrumbs that allowed Russian spies to tap into their resources. This effort was the basis for the more-standard Russian 6d1f23a050
