Of course, there were other bad effects besides the idiots I'd met: There was the condescension of a quarter of the life-long moviegoers I . Day 25: 1,000+ Part of why I love the outdoors so much is that my ability to see things is limited only by my vision, not my intelligence. It's a completely different approach than a computer, to be able to look at a landscape and observe details with complete clarity when there are thousands of other things you can be doing. I've mentioned this before, but this trip is an opportunity to observe the changes in the world over a short span of time. Without reading the history of those areas and their people, I can't even begin to appreciate how much things are changing. For example, while I was in the Southern Nevada desert, the black tumbleweeds on the roadside have given way to green ones. They look totally different, and I haven't seen a single person walking in those fields. There are still tumbleweeds in the fields near the community center, but this desert is in a state of transition. Two years ago, we had areas of desert that were planted with crops. Now those fields are overrun with green oleander (called 'jimson weed' by some). In those areas, the only source of water is the man-made aqueduct that supplies water to Las Vegas, and even that has been reduced. This trip has been an opportunity to see that desert change and accept it, or let it pass. There are no oceans here, and many of the rainforests have been deforested in this part of the world, but there are still vast expanses of wilderness. The desert will slowly reclaim its place here in the West, and those trees will become more common in the future. In the meantime, the rest of the world will progress on its course, and none of this will matter. For example, in the next two or three years, an artificial scarcity of natural resources will probably mean that we 6d1f23a050
